Drug Testing

Is your company requiring drug testing? Some of you may not like the procedure very much. So what’s the best possible attitude to have about this matter? You can joke about it—that’s ok. You can grumble about it—that’s natural. But do you want your employer to change the company policy to stop the testing? Here’s what that would probably mean:

Firms that do not test these days tend to end up with a greater percentage of drug users, since word gets around about which companies test and which do not. This increases the chance that someone on your work team would be “high” and not able to maintain work quality, safety and production levels.

A typical “recreational” drug user, compared to a non-drug user in today’s workforce, is three times more likely to injure himself, herself or another person in a workplace accident. This means you may not be safe around such a co-worker, no matter how careful you are.

The typical recreational drug user is 2.2 times more likely to request time off, and 2.5 times more likely to have an absence of eight days or more during a year. This means you may have to personally make up for what’s not being done during that person’s absence.

Drug users are 5 times more likely to file a workers’ compensation claim. Just as your car insurance goes up when you have an accident, your employer’s insurance costs may go up when many claims are filed. This has an affect on company profits and potentially on your own wages or bonus.

Up to 40% of industrial fatalities and 47% of industrial injuries are related to alcohol abuse and alcoholism. Workplace accident rates are two or three times higher than normal for alcoholics.

A recent survey of drug users who were seeking help in regard to their drug habits revealed:

75% had used drugs on the job
44% had sold drugs to other employees
18% had stolen from co-workers to support their habits

So, your employer’s drug screening program is an advantage to you. It helps assure that your co-workers will be alert, hardworking and responsible- and that you will go home safely. It may also help individuals who are trying to kick the habit. It’s smart to support the program.
